SUPPLY CORPS OFFICER

The Navy's Supply Corps Officers are a highly trained, specialized team of professionals performing executive-level duties in supply chain management, acquisition and contracting, material logistics, physical distribution, financial management, and operations research.

As a Supply Corps Officer, you'll quickly attain management experience in a broad range of business and logistics disciplines, which are essential to ensuring successful naval missions. During your career, you could serve aboard a navy ship, in an expeditionary environment, or ashore – almost anywhere in the world.

BECOMING A SUPPLY CORPS OFFICER

With a bachelor's degree and a competitive GPA, the first step is to work with a Navy recruiter to complete an application package. This process can begin a few months prior to graduation. This is a competitive process where you can earn a commission if your package is selected. Upon commissioning, you will attend Officer Candidate School (OCS) followed by Navy Supply Corps School in Newport, RI.

Your training will include a 26 week Basic Qualification Course. This course develops critical thinking, decision-making skills and problem solving in realistic operational environments. It provides technical training in logistics functions, financial management, retail and food service operations. This training will teach you how to effectively lead the talented Supply department enlisted sailors that will work for you.

YOUR FIRST ASSIGNMENT

During your first tour – most likely at sea – you will find out what it takes to be a successful Navy logistician and professional business manager. Regardless of the size of your unit, you will have a challenging and rewarding assignment with a great deal of responsibility.

ADVANCED TRAINING

The Supply Corps is dedicated to investing in the continued professional development and growth of its officers. Nearly all Supply Corps Officers who serve beyond their initial tour are offered fully funded postgraduate education at some of the nation's finest business schools or the Naval Postgraduate School at Monterey, CA. You'll be able to earn an advanced degree of your choice in business administration, supply chain management, financial management, logistics, operations research, or petroleum management.
